All this time Prince Dolgorouki, one of the richest noblemen in Russia, was an ardent suitor of Cavalieri. Considerably over six feet tail, strikingly handsome, practiced in all the arts of attracting lovely woman, he was just the kind of a man who would take by storm the heart of a capricious beauty. Because of his assiduous attentions. Cavalieri blew hot and cold for Chanler. As day after day he asked her to marry him, she put him off, taking care not to decline him, but not wanting to accept him when there was a possibility that she would land the Russian, whom she is said to have loved as much as Chanler loved her. Then, in March of this year, with other famous grand opera singers. Cavalieri sailed for Europe, having promised Chanler she would decide on April 15 whether or not she would of the richest noblemen in Russia, was

But the auterat of the Russians was obdurate. The fair Lina and the handsome prince were the principals in a heart-runding and tearful parting, and she returned to Paris. On April 15, as she had promised, she cabled Chanler that she would marry him.

Within less than a month Chanler was on his way to Paris. Arriving there he lost no time in getting to the home of the rair Lina in the Channes Elysses.

all the rapture of a successful lover.

Then Chanler began to count the minutes when the great prima donna would share his name and fortune, little thinking that within a very few months she would not Cally "share" his fortune, but have possession of every cent of it.

temperament, but her business sense and acumen is beyond question. The talk of the wedding naturally brought on negotiations concerning the amount that would be settled on madame.

A French notary and an English solicitor, Cavalier's representatives, called on Chanler and began to ply him with questions concerning his financial standing. At their behest he went into details concerning his fortune, telling them just how much property he had, where it was situated and how certain portions of it were tied up in trust funds. He explained to them that he and his first wife had been divorced and that enough of his inheritance had been made into a trust fund to give her alimony of $20,000 a year. Then he showed that he had about $30,000 a year lish solicitor went away.

In the first place she told him the story of her life. In detail she related to him all the experiences of her childhood; how as her girlish prettiness developed into womanly beauty she became the pet of certain men of the great world of Paris, the leader of the demi-monde, disputing the title only with Cleo de Merode. Then she told of her life in the Paris half-world, of the gay bachelors, the dashing married men and aristocrats who had wined her and dined her and had loaded her with jewels, fine gowns, costly hats, expensive lingerie and the thousand and one things so dear to the heart of a professional heanty—a woman who must get rich before she gets old. Chanler heard all of this, but he was so filled with a desire to possess Cavalieri that it did not disturb him.

lieri. From the moment he set eyes on her, the grandson of John Jacob Astor lived with one object in view, to make her his wife. He went to see her at noon every day, as soon as the singer had left her bed-room; he went to hear her sing every time she appeared at the Manhatton Opera House, and then took her to supper every night after the performance.

There was nothing the singer expressed a desire for that Chanler did not try to move heaven and earth to get. For twelve months the millionaire courted Cavalieri. She played him along, now sending him to the seventh heaven of rapture, now plunging him to the lowest depths of despair. Many an afternoon she would go to his studio on Fifth avenue and, while Chanler would pretend to work on his mural paintings, Cavalieri would sit at the plano, pand and sing to him, or would loll in an easy chair by his side, watching him work and sipping tea.
